Stimulus C

'It's only a dream,' Conor said to himself in the back garden, looking up at the monster silhouetted against the moon in the night sky. He folded his arms tightly against his body, not because it was cold, but because he couldn't really believe he'd tiptoed down the stairs, unlocked the back door and come outside.

He still felt calm. Which was weird. This nightmare — because it was surely a nightmare, of course it was — was so different from the other nightmare.

No terror, no panic, no darkness, for one thing.

And yet here was a monster, clear as the clearest night, towering ten or fifteen metres above him, breathing heavily in the night air.

from 'A Monster Calls' by Patrick Ness
